EA's technical team worked closely with the NFL to collect the player data to take full advantage of this technology. And while it took two years of development to perfect, the project was ultimately worth it. "Each one of the players was right there on the sidelines," EA SPORTS® FIFA Digital Creative Director Marcus Sorel said. "We all worked with the players to build the in-game animations, collecting data and collecting data of touches. We got feedback and got to see where we could improve things. It was a long process but we made it happen." EA made sure to get the player data from high-profile athletes as well. Gloster the Great, NFL legend Dwight Clark, NFL Commissioner Roger Goodell and Seahawks quarterback Russell Wilson all helped add their personalities to the game through the creative input from the NFL and the EA Sports community. "It was more a day in the life of a player, really," said NFL Players Association GM/Communications Director George Atallah, who was asked by EA SPORTS whether he worked with EA to get the player data for the project. "It's an ongoing relationship and it can be taxing at times. But he is the ultimate professional. He did a great job. It is a labor of love and very cool to get to see it in the game." The data was collected from 22 players in a series of motion capture suits which all players were required to wear for the game to accurately identify player and ball movement. The players were inside a "motion-capture box" which measured their motions and recorded their movements on a computer. The game uses the data to shape gameplay. And the simulation is all about the data. The in-game animations and coverage are based on the player model and the rig was able to create the "future" look of the game, in motion. "As technology has gotten smarter, we are getting closer and closer to that vision," Sorel said. "If you didn't have motion capture, you could not build the level of accuracy and fidelity that would be found in FIFA 22. You can't fake it. That is the goal. We can't get there without data, and that is what we are collecting through motion capture." EA used data from TopDrawerSoccer, the official ball of
